he day, which should have been an ordinary day, ended up being the reason video games were created.

No Quarter Podcast co-host Mr.
Carrington Vanston, who had been guaranteed a loss by his rival Mr. Mike Maginnis, prevailed in a round of Galaga, 141,150 to 123,660.

The win was shocking in that Mr. Maginnis considered Galaga one of his favorite games of all time, and the dedication he had given the title all but assured his victory over Mr. Vanston.

As billiards players went about their business in the background, a scene was unfolding next to the Golden Tee Arcade machine.

"Are you afraid?" Mr. Vanston asked. His competition, much like his score, remained silent.

The two dueled as part of their weekly No Quarter podcast, the greatest arcade-focused podcast on the internets. Many times, Mr. Maginnis prevailed, but today, the win belonged to Mr. Vanston.

Upon hearing about the victory, thousands of No Quarter fans lined the streets to cheer on Mr. Vanston, reveling in the joy that is a beaten Mr. Maginnis.

Despite unfounded accusations of cheating from Mr. Maginnis, the victory would not be tarnished. It was short-lived, however, as Mr. Maginnis would prevail the next week in a game of Mad Planets.

That victory though, remained hollow, as Mr. Vanston will forever be known as the better Galaga player.

And besides, Mad Planets? LOL ok.
